

Freedom Club News

We recently have been working on educating our customers on all the kinds of fraud that we are seeing. One recent article shared with us highlighted SIM card hijacking, also known as SIM swapping. Today, your phone number is more than a way to make calls—it often serves as a digital ID connected to your email, social media, and possibly your bank accounts. In a SIM swap attack, criminals do not need to access your phone directly. Instead, they target the mobile carrier's process, so your number is redirected to their device. From there, password reset links and texted authentication codes can land in the attacker's inbox.

To help prevent SIM swapping, use strong, unique passwords, consider using a password manager, review your account recovery options, and watch for notifications about phone number changes. The goal is to ensure that even if someone intercepts a text code, they still cannot easily reset your passwords.
